Guest Speaker-

Arvid Veidmark, SSC Global – MAG 608 HDD Standard (page 68) While working on the 602 standard, it became apparent to MAG committee members that with the thirteen different types of tools for horizontal directionally drilling for utility installation, there was a need for a standard. This installation method, which has only been around 25-30 years, has gained in popularity due to lower costs and post construction repairs in Right-of-Way applications. HDD is used for wet and dry utility installation. North American Society for Trenchless Technology (NASTT) has the HDD Good Practices Guideline available for anyone who is interested in reference material. The MAG Sewer & Water Working Group took this information and working with industry stake holders developed this standard. They classified the different jobs based on length. Bore sizes also affect the design and permitting requirements. This is the first specification with a table in it. The table aids in determining size. We reviewed the different sections and applications of this standard.
